"PEOPLE SAY."

Ian Maclaren writes as follows in The Christian Endeavor World: Suppose, to make a study in moral cowardice, your friend has agreed with you in the morning to follow a certain line of action, because it is right, and there is not much difference among intelligent men about righteousness. An hour afterward he meets A, who has a biting tongue, and ridicules your actions. B, who is a very rich man, says a little later that he at least will have nothing to do with it. Later still, C declares that it will be very unpopular; and hour three days from Newcastle; dismasted by hour various letters of the alphabet attack, disown and condemn what you I.-L. stmr. James Makee, Tullett, intended to do. None of the letters represent much conscience, and none of tion; but they have the cumulative effeet of suggesting to your friend that the does this thing he will be made fortable. His resolution crumway before this flood, and in the the fashion of his countenance has altered. On thinking over the matw sees some difficulty, and ter L feels, that it would be well to wait a little.

You re ind him that this is not a matter of expediency, but of justice. "Quite so," he says; "no doubt, but"and he hesitates. You know then that he has been sending up kites all day to see how the wind is blowing, and that he has no mind to go in its teeth. It is a collapse of conscience, and your friend does not propose to cast in his lot with a minority of one. He shambles off inwardly ashamed, but he will not face that combination of letters. "People say," and the average person makes an abject surrender.

... HER IDEA OF IT.

"Charley, dear," said young Mrs. Torkins, "I wish you would save up your money and buy a yacht."
